3. The Aggressive Med-Hit (The Cyber-Inhaler) Since he has a bad heart and takes pills, give him a brutal-looking, metallic medical inhaler.
 - The Vibe: When his trauma flares up or he gets cornered, instead of lighting a smoke, he pulls this metal tube and takes a violent, deep hit of oxygen or stimulants. It looks like an addict taking a hit, but functionally, it's him desperately trying to keep his heart from stalling.
 - The Dev Hack: It's a fast, blunt animation. Hand goes to mouth, intense audio cue (a sharp hiss of compressed air), hand drops. No lingering smoke VFX to track.
2. The Flame Fixation (Hand Idle Only) Give him a heavy, beat-up metal lighter (like a Zippo).
 - The Vibe: He flips it open, strikes the flame, stares at it for a second, and snaps it shut. It tells the exact story you want: he wants to be destructive, he has the tool right in his hand, but he's forcing himself to snap it shut and stay alive.
 - The Dev Hack: You only have to animate the hand. The arm stays by his waist or chest. The sound design does the heavy lifting here—that sharp metallic clack of the lighter closing becomes his signature sound of frustration.

1. The "Relapse" Mechanic (Visual Storytelling)

Make the cigarette a storytelling device rather than a baseline habit.

- The Baseline: Sa actively tries not to smoke. He knows his heart can't take it. Maybe he just carries a heavy, metal lighter that he flips open and closed as his kinetic "fidget" habit. It burns off his physical energy without damaging his lungs.
- The Trigger: He only actually puts a cigarette in his mouth and lights it when the TBI or trauma is triggered. When the feral, self-destructive side takes the wheel, the survival instinct shuts off.
- The Player Experience: This turns the act of smoking into a visual gauge for the player. When Sa lights up, the player instantly knows: Sa is no longer thinking logically; he has lost control.
